This Term, in King v. Burwell, the Supreme Court will consider whether the Affordable Care Act permits the government to extend tax-credit subsidies to citizens of states that have chosen not to establish their own insurance exchange. If the Court rules that these subsidies are not permitted under the law, the fallout will be extensive and possibly devastating to state insurance markets, and countless state, and federal actors will have to decide how to move forward. This event will bring together scholars and practitioners in the fields of law, public health economics to evaluate the oral argument in the case and consider how the Court is likely to rule before exploring the likely impacts of a decision against the government and beginning to build groundwork for politically-viable fixes at all levels of public and involvement.
